

THE DAISY-GIRL

By MOLLIE MATHER.

(© 1921, Western Newspaper Union.)

Had Dorothea lived in olden time, she would have demanded her knight to climb the highest cliff for the flower of her fancy. As it was, she led Bruce Allan, her fiance, a trying life. The very capriciousness which at first charmed him, was now his trial.

Dorothea continually sought difficult tasks with which to try his affection. Though Dorothea had promised him her heart and hand, this fact did not deter her from encouraging rivalry among those apparently vanquished.

"If you cannot spare an afternoon to take me out to the country club," she would tell her fiance sweetly, "Don Stewart will be glad to do it. He called up to see if there was a chance, this morning."

So Bruce would spare the afternoon to the neglect of business. Or, "if you do not feel that you can afford orchids for my orchid gown this evening Bruce, Hamilton Dane is just eager to get them for me from his florist."

Alas! Bruce Allan could afford no orchids from his hard-earned purse. His one ambition had been to lay by each month toward the feathering of a dainty nest for Dorothea.

Poor Bruce was growing distracted because of Dorothea's pouting displeasure. Pink daisies, or rather, pink marguerites, were the latest insistent desire of her heart. She had happened to pass a bed of these tall flowers and immediately had been seized with the desire to give a pink daisy tea with bundles of the unusual flowers in evidence everywhere, and herself, clad in pink with a pale yellow hat. It would all be so "sweet and odd," she told Bruce excitedly.

Bruce agreed that it would. But this did not end his part in the matter.

He had tried his best to locate the coveted blossoms, but two afternoons motoring with Dorothea, failed to disclose the flower bed of her vision. She was put out about it, holding Bruce accountable for the disappointment. So now, upon the sunshiny morning when Bruce wandered moodily down the hill, not only Hamilton Dane, but Don Stewart as well, were out on the quest of the tall pink daisy. The triumph of either, at a florist's shop, would mean his own defeat. Dorothea put this plainly. The head of the business office had sent him this particular morning to a rural township to look over some real estate. Bruce had taken the trolley out.

Presently, as he walked across a cedar-fragrant hedge, came a sweet-sounding voice, the bees over the hedge hummed accompaniment: "My own he comes and he loves me well."

This is the tale that my daisies tell,"—sang a girl bending over a bed—yes, actually—a bed of tall pink marguerites. Bruce by his sudden entrance startled the girl into dropping scissors and basket, but she picked them up again undismayed.

"My customers," she told him laughingly, "usually enter in more conventional manner than vaulting the hedge. What would you like?"

"Customer," he asked hesitatingly, "you mean that you sell things?"

The girl nodded.

"Flowers," she answered briefly, "that's what I raise 'em for."

"And I can buy the pink daisies," his tone was eager. "All of them, or perhaps," he added lamely. "You ask too big a price."

Then, before he knew it, he was telling her about Dorothea and the pink daisy tea; of his own futile search and the humility of failure.

"Isn't it funny," the girl remarked with a whimsical twist to her red lips, "one girl in the city wanting, and planning for pink daisies, just to make a holiday. And another girl out in the country working since early spring to grow the flowers and sell them to earn bread and butter. Mother and I live alone and we have to plan many ways to keep our home fire burning. Flowers are the best part of my plan. And coaxing them along is pleasure."

"You see," she said, "I am giving them all. The price will not matter. You must be—" she smiled, "the triumphant knight returning to win your lady's favor."

"I am not sure," he said, "that I care to win that favor. I've been sitting here doing some thinking and comparing. Looking back over past weeks of my engagement, I cannot see that either of us has been very happy. Dorothea told me when she was disappointed last night that the man who carried out this silly wish of hers, would be hereafter the one man for her. Dane can buy all the rare flowers he wants. As for me—well, I'll take your daisies, and keep 'em in my own room."

"You need not," said the girl quickly, "I can sell them."

"I want," said Bruce gravely, "every daisy that has known your care. And I want very much—to come here again—soon."

The girl did not reply, but as he went down the path he heard again the words of her song:

"My own, he comes and he loves me well."

This is the tale my daisies tell."

Suddenly, she stopped and Bruce, looking back saw her face flush rose color.

"I shall come tomorrow, Daisy-girl," he said, and she smiled across the hedge.

The Constant Plague

Great excitement and activity is caused every so often by the announcement of an outbreak of bubonic plague, cholera or typhus fever in one of our seaports.

Another disease that does hundreds of times as much damage and havoc in the low areas of the Southwestern States and in the Southern Half of the United States is Malaria.

It may be termed the "constant plague" for it is always present. It does not cause directly a great many deaths but indirectly it contributes annually to many fatalities, and in each case of illness causes a great loss of labor and efficiency, besides being an expense to the patient. It is likewise the greatest cause of industrial inefficiency.

If you don't want Malaria don't let a mosquito bite you. Malaria is contracted only through the bite of a mosquito, the "Anopheles."

Man infects the mosquito and in turn the mosquito infects man. Malaria is due to a germ which lies in the blood cells of the human body. It is so small that it requires a very powerful microscope to see it.

The malaria mosquito does most of its biting at dusk or twilight, less frequently during darkness and it is necessary to keep the house thoroughly screened. As these mosquitoes breed by depositing eggs in standing water, all such pools should be drained if possible, or, if not, a small amount of kerosene oil should be poured on the surface to destroy the larvae.

A certain type of minnows placed in the water will eat the mosquito eggs.

Mr. Burkert Knows How To Make Brooms That Do Their Work Well.

Ste. Genevieve is fortunate in having a citizen like Mr. Evariste Burkert, of 238 North 3rd Street. He has lived here for over half a century and can tell many an interesting story of pioneer days. His has been a useful life in more ways than one—not the least of which is, that he furnishes the community with good brooms. He's always ready to give his friends the benefit of his experiences. Many Ste. Genevieve folks should profit by what he tells of his use of Donn's Kidney Pills.

Mr. Burkert says: "About four years ago my back was lame and sore-brothering me quite a bit. My kidneys were disordered and I had to get up many times at night, the secretion being free and scanty. There was a heavy dragging feeling across my back that seemed to hold me down. A friend told me to try Donn's Kidney Pills and after using them it was no time before I felt better. Two boxes from Meyer's Drug Store cured me of the trouble. I can recommend Donn's Kidney Pills to anyone troubled with bad kidneys."

Price 60c, at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Donn's Kidney Pills—the same that Mr. Burkert had. Foster-Milburn Co., Mgrs., Buffalo, N. Y. adv

Look Out For Moldy Bread

Special care should be given at this time of year to the container in which the light bread is kept. Bread should not be wrapped in a cloth while hot, says Miss Addie D. Root of the Missouri College of Agriculture at Columbia. There is a large amount of steam in the loaf which, unless it is allowed to escape, will condense and make the bread moist enough to sour easily. The hot bread should be placed on racks in a good current of air so that the air may circulate around it. The receptacle in which the bread is stored should receive frequent attention. Tin or earthenware containers are best as they can be thoroughly scalded and aired. Crumbs which are allowed to remain in the bottom of the box frequently become molded and impart a bad smell and taste to the fresh bread.

The man who says life isn't worth while is the man who isn't making life worth while for other folks.
